

Fire stops in noncombustible buildings

Wood is commonly used for fire stops in combustible construction and it may also be used in noncombustible assemblies. Wood is permitted as a fire stop material for dividing concealed spaces into compartments in roofs of combustible construction.

However, wood fire stops must meet the criteria for fire stops when the assembly is subject to the standard fire test used to determine fire resistance.